Making Connections--Dialogue in Dialect

Zora Neale Hurston was not just a novelist but also a student of anthropology. She was deeply interested in linguistic anthropology, which is the study of speech patterns and the relationship between communication and culture. The novel reflects her interest in dialects and speech patterns. In the novel, Hurston's characters speak in a dialect, frequently expressing themselves through the use of inventive figures of speech, such as similes, metaphors, and hyperbole.

Directions: The following sentences from chapters 1-4 are written in dialect and contain figures of speech. Translate each phrase into standard, contemporary English that expresses its meaning.

1. Janie: "I reckon they got me up in they mouth now." (ch. 1)
